BNAI BRITH HEAD PRAISES GREAT DIGNITY OF JEWS IN ARGENTINA DANGER

The Argentine Government will act on a proposal to outlaw political movements that promote racial or religious discord, according to Label A. Katz, president of Bnai Brith. Mr. Katz said he was advised by Rodolfo Martinez, Jr., Minister of Interior, that the Argentine Cabinet would shortly consider such a measure. It is being drafted by Mr. Martinez. Cabinet approval, which is expected, would make it a government decree with the force of law. This procedure is provided for when the Argentine Congress has been dissolved. Constituent elections for a new Congress are not expected until next year.

Mr. Katz quoted the Argentine minister as saying that the measure will be designed to proscribe the anti-democratic activities of such groups as Tacuara, the leading neo-Nazi movement in Argentina. Generally assessed as a small but volatile movement of less than 5,000 adherents, mostly youth, Tacuara operates along para-military lines and overtly espouses anti-Semitic violence. Mr. Katz spent a week in Buenos Aires where, in a series of meetings with Argentine President Jose Maria Guido and three members of the Argentine Cabinet, he expressed his organization's "very grave concern" over the recent wave of anti-Jewish terrorism in Argentina. He said in New York that President Guido and other Argentine officials gave him "strong assurances" that the government would act firmly to protect the physical security and economic and political rights of its Jewish citizens.

"President Guido was quite forceful in expressing his own [illegible] of anti-Semitism and [illegible] by extremist groups," [illegible] said. "The President said he has personally instructed police authorities that there be strict enforcement of the law against anti-Semitic vandalism and violence."

The failure or unwillingness of Argentine police to apprehend any of the terrorists despite more than fifty incidents of violence last spring and summer, including the torture and beating of Jews and non-Jews, the bombing and machine-gunning of synagogues and Jewish-owned businesses, and the desecration of Jewish institutions, created a wave of anxiety and fear among Argentine Jews and evoked strong protests from Jewish groups in the United States and elsewhere.

The U.S. State Department also "informally" advised the Argentine government of its "concern" over the rash of anti-Semitic attacks. A recent change in the police administration resulted in replacement of the police chief who had been charged with failing to take vigorous action against the attackers. Mr. Katz had several discussions with Dr. Martinez. He also met with Foreign Minister Carlos M. Muniz and Minister of the Economy Alvaro Alsogaray, and with leaders of the Argentine Jewish community. Dr. Muniz also stressed that the Government "will take all measures necessary and possible to make democratic practices and freedoms (in Argentina) secure," Mr. Katz said.

The Bnai Brith leader said he had confidence in the good faith of Argentine leaders but "a precondition to implementing these guarantees is the need for the Government to overcome the spectre of instability and unrest that has infected the political life of the country." This condition, he added, can be attributed directly to the very serious economic difficulties of once-prosperous Argentina.

"Argentine community leaders are agreed that the deteriorating economy, creating uncertainty in the successive governments of the past several years, has both stimulated the activity of anti-Semitic movements and allowed their violence to go unpunished," Mr. Katz said. Such groups, small but boldly active, are further encouraged [illegible] in Argentina.

While a few of the Catholic clergy in Argentina have sided with the extremists, they are not representative of the Church or the priesthood, Mr. Katz said. What has troubled the Jewish community, is the fact that the Church has largely remained silent on the issue.

The Bnai Brith leader said that the survival of democracy in Argentina is absolutely essential to the survival of democracy in Latin America. The long-term economic development plans of the Alliance for Progress, while serving a necessary purpose, do not answer Argentina's immediate needs to stimulate its economic recovery and stabilize its government. [illegible] Argentine Jewish community conducted itself with firmness, restraint and great dignity in the face of the mounting provocations and violence during the summer months. "The intensity of the anti-Semitic violence has lessened considerably in recent weeks," he said. "But Argentine Jews are still apprehensive and on their guard." The 119-year-old Bnai Brith, an American-centered organization with 470,000 members, has affiliates in Argentina and other Latin American countries.

Nazi Groups Infest Twenty-Two Countries, Meet Internationally

Neo-Nazi groups and individuals, spouting Fascism and anti-Semitism, have staged more than twenty international conferences and sessions in recent years to discuss and co-ordinate their activities, according to a report by the World Jewish Congress in New York. The figure may be much higher because "neo-Nazi and neo-Fascist movements frequently keep their international contacts secret."

But Dr. Nehemiah Robinson, of New York, who heads the World Jewish Congress' research wing, the Institute of Jewish Affairs, details neo-Fascist and anti-Semitic conclaves since 1946, pointing out that their frequency has increased recently, with at least two or three known conferences each year and many European capitals acting as hosts, mostly involuntarily.

In his report to the global executive of the World Jewish Congress, Dr. Robinson names twenty-two countries as having Fascist groups or individuals active in or connected with the "Nazi International": Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Britain, Denmark, Finland, France, Holland, Hungary (exiles), Ireland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, South Africa, Syria, Turkey, U.S.A., West Germany.

The WJC report states that the Ku Klux Klan "has also branched out in foreign countries," and Dr. Robinson names ten other groups with international connections:

1. The European New Order (ENO) with groups in Germany, Austria, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, and the participation of OAS men and some British Fascists. 2. The European Social Movement (ESB) led by Per Engdahl, of Sweden, with 60 associated organizations in 14 countries, not counting contacts in Arab lands. 3. The Movement of Civic Action (MAC). 4. Young Europe, an association of rightist youth organizations in Europe which cooperates with like-minded organizations in USA. 5. The Northern Ring (NER) established as recently as 1961, consisting of splinter groups in Europe and overseas. 6. The Northern League based on the concept of the Nordic race, headed by Roger Pearson, of London, with contacts in USA and throughout Europe. 7. The Nordisk Association, with headquarters in Sweden. 8. Young European Legion (associated with Young Europe), established in 1959 in Vienna with associated groups in Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, France, Belgium and Holland. 9. Action associations of former S.S. men in various countries of Europe, connected with groups of Latvian, Estonian, Ukrainian, and Albanian exiles, and Spaniards. 10. The German Homeland Loyalist Youth Organisation (Bund Heimattreuer Jugend), which also has contacts in Austria.

Not all the planned international gatherings of Nazis have been successes. Some have been banned, as was a Mosleyite conference of "Friends of Europe" slated for London in December, 1961. Some failed because of insufficient response, as happened to a planned meeting of 600 lesser Nazi groups called off when the sponsors found they could not get enough support for a conference in Wiesbaden in 1961.

But, Dr. Robinson states, "in toto, the international (Nazi) organizations have representatives in [illegible] Australia, South Africa, some Latin American and Arab lands."

The WJC offers no estimate of the number of persons involved in the Nazi groups all over the world but notes that "the ESB (European Social Movement) and EVS (Bureau of European Liaison) claimed some time ago to have four million supporters organised in some 10,000 sections and cells. It is impossible to establish how exaggerated this claim is, because none of the organizations publishes membership figures."

Dr. Robinson states that the fi-

Book Dealer Was Erudite Man Of Culture Without College Aid

Henry Schuman, a dealer in rare science and medicine books and a former publisher, who died in New York at Beth Israel Hospital, was 63 years old, lived at 2211 Broadway, and established the Life of Science Library, a series of biographies and histories in science, medicine, technology, and the social sciences, which he published under the imprint of Henry Schuman, says the New York Times. On occasion, however, he would stray from his field and publish books on such diverse subjects as Halloween, Israel, and Charlie Chaplin.

He was born in Russia on May 15, 1899, and was brought to the U.S. when he was about two years old. He attended De Witt Clinton High School in New York and then his family moved to Detroit, Mich., where he started a ball-bearing business and, incidentally, began to collect books.

The ball-bearing business proving non-lucrative in the Depression era, Mr. Schuman opened a book shop in Detroit. One of his first customers was a physician looking for an old book on stethoscopy — "de l'auscultation médiate", by René Laennec, the inventor of the stethoscope, published in 1819.

Mr. Schuman did not have the book in stock, but he began a search for it. He found a copy, [illegible] rare medical books. Among his clients were the late Dr. Harvey Cushing, of Boston, and the late Sir William Osler. Mr. Schuman had begun publishing in Detroit in a small way. He once brought out a book of poems by Katherine Anne Porter before she achieved note as a short story writer.

In 1939 he went to New York to set up his business. He founded the publishing house of Henry Schuman, Inc., in 1948, which was bought out in 1953, and became Abelard-Schuman, Ltd. He then devoted himself exclusively to his book dealing business.

Mr. Schuman, who had taken violin lessons as a boy, took up the violin again as an adult and started a chamber music group. Although he never went beyond high school, he was an erudite, cultured man, says the New York Times. He is survived by his widow, the former Miss Ida Walerstein; two sons, Henry, Jr., a musician; and Daniel, an artist; and three sisters, Mrs. Ann Cohen, Mrs. Boris Reed, and Mrs. Joseph Hurwitz.

Leader Sees Growing Lack Of Rabbis, Teachers

Rabbi Theodore Friedman, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the international Association of Conservative rabbis, recently outlined his program to strengthen every phase of Jewish life.

Rabbi Friedman, is also leader of Congregation Beth El of the Oranges, and Maplewood, N.J. He asserted that Jewish communities in various parts of the world were confronted with a "process of attrition for lack of dynamic religious leadership."

In this connection, he announced the establishment of a special fund by the Assembly to enable members to serve congregations in Israel and other parts of the world. Citing the Peace Corps for its social and economic aid, Rabbi Friedman declared that the fund "will seek to do the same on the religious and cultural level for overseas Jewish communities."

He said that in Israel "few organized alternatives to an uncompromising, anachronistic fundamentalism are available, though there is ample evidence for a serious quest for such alternatives on the part of many old residents and newcomers."

Rabbi Friedman said it would be "the task of specially trained Conservative rabbis to make their services available to these groups by establishing synagogue-centered programs."

Orthodoxy is the dominant religious force in Israel. The Reform branch of Judaism recently established a synagogue in Jerusalem. In recent years, several Israel, synagogues have affiliated

Asks Some Of U. S. Money For Religion In Israel To Go To Reform Jews

The Israel Ministry of Religion and the American Jewish Agency were urged to use for Reform Jewish activities some of the money raised in the U.S. for religious purposes in Israel. The request came from Walter W. Weismann, president of Congregation Rodeph Sholom, 7 West 83rd Street, in New York. He announced a gift of $10,000 from his congregation for building a Reform congregation in Jerusalem.

"It is unjust," he said, "that all sums go for the support of Orthodox Judaism. This is especially reprehensible when we know that a substantial portion of Jewish Agency funds raised through the United Jewish Appeal comes from members of Reform congregations in the United States."

Mr. Weismann said the $10,000 gift had been made through the World Union of Progressive Judaism, independent of the Israel government's Ministry of Religion or of the Jewish Agency.

The Israeli government recognizes only Orthodox Judaism, he said. There are three Reform congregations in Israel, says the New York Herald Tribune. One, in Jerusalem, is to be aided by the Rodeph Sholom gift. The congregation bought land and a building through a gift last year from Robert I. Wishnick, of New Rochelle.

The World Union for Progressive Judaism, headed by Rabbi Solomon B. Freehof, of Pittsburgh, has headquarters at 838 Fifth Avenue, New York. It represents 1,500,000 persons in 22 countries. The largest member body is the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Brights FINE CANADIAN Wines

SINCE 1874

At your sabbath table, a decanter of wine is as much at home as a challah.

No wine is more welcome in Jewish homes in Canada than Mazel Tov, a wine made from Concord grapes grown on the sunny slopes of the Niagara Peninsula.

Mazel Tov is ruby red in colour, and richly sweet—but not cloying—to the taste. It's a wine you'll "remember", the kind of wine that you used to taste many years ago.

Mazel Tov, made 'Kosher l'Pesach' under strict rabbinical supervision, is available throughout the year for every 'simcha'.

Jews Should Have Fewest Marriage Problems, Says Psychologist

BY JANE GREDY, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN NEWS SERVICE

Should a child's ideas be seriously considered in making family decisions? If you belong to a Conservative Jewish congregation, chances are you'll say yes. But if you're a Roman Catholic or conservative Baptist, you're more likely to say no, recent research by Prof. Paul H. Whiteman, University of Wisconsin psychologist, reveals. In his study of how religious affiliation affects parents' ideas about themselves and their children, Whiteman tested thirty parent couples from each of the three congregations. He drew his 180-person sample from the Minneapolis, Minnesota, area equating the educational level and socio-economic status of the groups.

Personality and attitude tests revealed surprising similarities between Catholic and Baptist parents; and some striking differences between these groups and Jewish parents, according to Whiteman. For example, he found that Jewish parents encourage their children to speak up more than do Catholic and Baptist parents. This, he feels, may be related to the less rigid authority structure characteristic of present-day Judaism as compared with the other two religions.

"The Jewish group," Whiteman states, "may be characterized as having the least closed system of beliefs and disbeliefs binging on absolute authority. As parents, they are more likely to interact flexibly and democratically with each other and their children. Catholics, however, most closely follow ritual and doctrine under rigid authority," Whiteman continues. As predicted, the study showed they tend to deal more dogmatically with their children and exclude outside influences as much as possible.

Whiteman assumed that, of the three, the Baptist faith places the greatest demands on its followers to maintain rigid moral standards. Such pressures, he expected, would give rise to tension. If such tension lacked a suitable outlet, it would create interpersonal conflicts such as marital difficulties. The Jewish group, on the other hand, is under the least rigid pressure and should have the fewest problems in marriage, Whiteman continues.

But Jewish parents indicated more often than the others that marriage is not always serene, that even two people in love can have arguments, that sometimes a wife has to demand her rights. Such a realistic attitude, although seeming less harmonious, is considered more desirable, according to psychological and sociological standards. The Jewish group also indicated greatest acceptance of reality by recognizing that irritation is inevitable in family life. It's a rare mother, they noted most often, who can be sweet and even-tempered with her children all day.

Other psychologically desirable attitudes expressed most frequently by the Jewish parents are that withdrawing behavior in children can be more of a problem than aggressive behavior, and that parents who over-protect their children may do more harm than good.

Whiteman, who is director of the University of Wisconsin Psycho-Educational Clinic, also tested the effects of religious affiliation upon a person's conception of himself. The Baptist faith strongly emphasizes the individual's personal responsibility to achieve acceptability to God, and gives its followers the least opportunity to excuse behavior contrary to religious prescription. As Whiteman predicted from these assumptions, Baptists expressed the highest degrees of responsibility and emotional control. They also reflect the opinions and follow the standards of their group more than the others.

The strength of Catholic attitudes on the issues which Whiteman studied tended to fall somewhere between that of the other two groups, usually closer to Baptist opinion. Generally, Whiteman concludes, the study supports the belief common to both clergy and laity that a particular religious orientation constitutes a unique way of life. At least, Roman Catholics, conservative Jews, and conservative Baptists show differences in their day-to-day behaviour as well as in religious beliefs. However, these differences cannot always be predicted, nor are they as great as might be expected, he cautions.

A Prince Gets A Commoner's Education

BY PEREGRINE WORSTHORNE, ASSISTANT EDITOR OF THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH, OF LONDON, ENGLAND, WRITING IN THE NEW YORK TIMES MAGAZINE

REPRINTED BY PERMISSION

In deciding to send the heir to the throne to Gordonstoun, about the least conventional public school in Britain, the Queen has initiated a new pattern of princely education. For Gordonstoun is significantly different from the socially exclusive kind of public school, like Eton or Harrow, which English princes might naturally be expected to attend.

Oddly enough, this has very little to do with its educational system, or with the fact that it was founded by a German, Kurt Hahn, who was expelled by the Nazis. Indeed, as far as education goes, Gordonstoun is probably far more like the Rugby of Tom Brown's school days than Rugby itself is now, and Dr. Hahn, who even in Germany was fascinated by British public-school methods and by the ideals which inspired them, has probably much more in common with the nineteenth-century Dr. Arnold than have most British headmasters of today.

Why, then, is the decision to send 13-year-old Prince Charles to Gordonstoun, starting with the summer term May 1, so remarkable? The answer, of course, is that what really distinguishes the top-rank British public school is not its type of education but the class of boy who goes there. What is unique about Eton is not the way it teaches Latin or math, but the fact that virtually all its pupils come either from the upper class or upper middle class.

In other words, the essence of Eton is not educational but social. Thus the significance of the decision not to send Prince Charles there, and not to have him educated by private tutors, but to send him instead to Gordonstoun, is not that he will get an education radically different from that of his predecessors, but that he will be the first monarch to be educated in an institution which is fundamentally classless.

For it is its classlessness, not its educational theories, which distinguishes Gordonstoun from the other public schools. To some extent, this is by intent. Since it is an essential part of Dr. Hahn's educational theory that a school should be integrated with the surrounding countryside, he naturally sought to attract the sons of the local fishermen as much as those of the local landowners and doctors.

More important, however, is the simple circumstance that Gordonstoun is relatively new, supposedly experimental, and founded by a German Jew. The British being as conservative as they are, such a school clearly has to rely for its support either on parents who, for one reason or another, are dissatisfied with the established pattern of upper-class education or on parents whose boys are unable to conform.

To some extent, in short, it is an educational salon des refusés, a school that attracts the eccentric and unusual, as much from the upper as the middle and lower classes. An earl with a son who would not fit into Eton, or a fisherman with one unsuited to the local state school — both might be expected to look to Gordonstoun.

So also might foreign parents who, while admiring the ideals of British public-school education, hesitate to send their sons to such exclusively British institutions as Eton or Harrow. This is one reason, of course, why Prince Charles' father, the Duke of Edinburgh — when he was still Prince Philip of Greece — was sent to Gordonstoun. This school, in other words transcends both British class and national boundaries more than any other private or state educational establishment in the kingdom.

To many, including the Duke of Edinburgh himself, these are probably the precise reasons which make it seem so suitable for the heir to the throne at this particular juncture in British history. Since his reign is likely to see ever greater social changes in this country, there is clearly a strong case for his not growing up exclusively in the company of an upper class which has long since ceased to fulfill its meaningful function. And at a time when Britain is seeking to move closer to Europe, a more international and less parochial outlook will also be of obvious advantage.

What a refreshing jolt to the public mood to have a monarch liberated from the constrictions of class and the blinkers of nationalism! That, at any rate, has been the immediate reaction of the great bulk of the population to the news of the Queen's decision. Virtually unanimous praise has greeted the announcement.

"It is a good choice," wrote the conservative Daily Mail. "The rather more rigorous disciplines of a school which is in some ways less conventional than others will do the young prince no harm. Besides which, he will find more freedom and less public distraction in Scotland than ever he would nearer London."

The Labor party's Daily Herald thought it a spectacular decision for political reasons, since for the first time an heir to the throne would be mixing with at least a few working-class boys on scholarships.

The liberal Guardian preferred to touch on the danger of the Queen's not having been quite egalitarian enough. A public school, it admitted, was inevitable; no one really expected that Prince Charles would be sent to a state school, still less to a co-educational establishment. But The Guardian felt compelled to remind the royal family that "the public schools as an institution are certainly not taken for granted; many of his future subjects, and one of the major parties of the state [the Labor party] think it wrong to separate children into different educational systems according to the wealth of their parents."

The more general view, however, was that the question of Prince Charles' education was really something for his own family to decide without external interference, and that it was only right and proper that the boy's father should want him to go to his own old school. There has been, therefore, little public debate.

Perhaps the comments of an Old Etonian best sum up the rather lighthearted general attitude:

"The heir to the throne may suffer from exposure to some character-building exercise in the northern twilight. At least, however, he will be spared the chronic bronchial congestion of the Thames Valley [where Eton is situated]. If he survives, he may end his school days without being on intimate terms with the titled fauna of his age group; but he will have a wide acquaintance among seagulls and ptarmigan. He will never have the privilege of wearing sponge-bag trousers and sporting a carnation. Long trousers and buttonholes of any kind are probably unknown at Gordonstoun. But he will be 'a man for a' that.'"

To those who think a little more deeply about the matter, however, this popular enthusiasm has seemed slightly premature. Theoretically, it is highly desirable that the future monarch should spend his most impressionable years living on terms of genuine equality with as many different conditions of his fellow subjects as possible. But just how genuinely will this aim be achieved by sending him to Gordonstoun?

Is public opinion correct in assuming that Prince Charles will learn more about real life, will lead a more normal existence, at Gordonstoun than he would if he were sent to a much more exclusive school like Eton or educated privately by tutors, with a few carefully selected sons of noblemen, which in the past has been royal princes' normal lot?

This question raises the central problem of educating royal princes: how to create an atmosphere in which their august status does not prevent all the normal relationships which are so necessary for growing children, if they are to develop as rounded human beings. In the past, it has always been implicitly assumed that the best, indeed the only, way of achieving this was to bring them up in the company of their peers since — horrible as it may sound to trans-Atlantic ears — the only people who feel truly at ease with royalty are the ancient noble families.

To put it another way, it has always been assumed that the aristocracy, simply because their way of life, values and traditions have so much in common with those of the royal family, are the only companions with whom an heir to the throne can have a relationship of genuine equality and intimacy. At least they both speak the same language.

What is more, the aristocracy, because of their close, historic connection with the court, are the families whom royalty tend to see most of in adult life, which means that friendships formed in the schoolroom have a real chance of lasting.

For all these reasons, therefore, it can be argued that Prince Charles might have a much better chance of experiencing the normal, egalitarian relationships of childhood and of being subjected to genuine rivalry and competition if he went to Eton — where most of his peers are educated — than he will by going to Gordonstoun, where his royal status will be infinitely more conspicuous.

Given the nature of Britain's class system, in short, and the unique status of royalty, it can reasonably be argued that the only way in which an heir to the throne can have an ordinary childhood is by making it as extraordinary as possible.

Right or wrong, this has certainly been the traditional royal practice, the only exception being made in favor of service schools like the Royal Naval Colleges of Osborne and Dartmouth, where both George V and VI were sent in their early teens. No heir to the throne before Prince Charles has ever been sent to an ordinary civilian school, let alone an establishment that boasts of its classless composition.

How different, for example, will be Prince Charles' attire, when he takes part in typical Gordonstoun activities such as mountaineering, farming and fire-brigade service from that of Edward VII, his great-great-grandfather, who went to the City in the State Barge with Prince Albert "wearing a black velvet coat with gilt buttons, and white waistcoat, black scarf and white peaked cap."

How different will be his religious training from that of Charles Stuart (Charles II), who was "bidden to look upon himself as God's deputy." An Anglican education Charles will certainly have, but far less exacting than that normally given to royal princes.

The primary reason Prince Charles' parents have broken with precedent is, of course, simply human and personal. The Duke of Edinburgh wanted to send his son to his old school where he was gloriously happy. It was also felt that its location, in the far north of Scotland, would make it difficult for press and public to interfere with the boy's privacy.

If he had been sent to Eton, for example, only twenty miles from London, there might be a constant stream of prying tourists looking over the wall. And in any case, as the Queen once put it, Eton is so near Windsor Castle, one of the family's main seats, that having Prince Charles there "would be like educating him in his own back garden."

Another private reason is that is was felt that Prince Charles himself is personally better suited to the more unorthodox educational methods at Gordonstoun than to those which he would have experienced at Eton or Winchester. Academically, Prince Charles' record while attending his preparatory school, Cheam, where he had been since the age of 9, was by no means outstanding. Clearly, therefore, there was much to be said for sending him to an institution where academic standards are a good deal less stringent than they are at the older and more famous seats of learning. Whatever else he acquires at Gordonstoun, it certainly will not be an intellectual inferiority complex.

But none of these personal reasons for sending Prince Charles to Gordonstoun would by themselves have been enough — particularly since the Queen Mother is known to have strongly favored Eton — had there not been powerful public arguments militating in the same direction.

By far the most powerful of these is the political need to dissociate royalty, which is a flourishing institution going from strength to strength in popular esteem, from the aristocracy, which plays an ever smaller role in Britain's public life. For reasons I have already touched on, this requires an enormously delicate act of severance, since the ties that bind the crown to the nobility are tightly woven into the very texture of the country's past. Even to this day the whole ceremonial which does so much to sustain the monarchy depends on the existence of hereditary noblemen who fill, so to speak, the indispensable bit parts in the royal pageant.

Yet, in the long run, there can be little doubt that the royal family, if it is successfully to embody and reflect the real nature of contemporary Britain, must extend its embrace to include all the new men of power and fame outside the narrow aristocratic circle.

To some extent, this is already being attempted by the Queen herself, who regularly entertains leading figures from industry, the universities, the trade unions, and even occasionally a distinguished journalist. But the experiment is not altogether successful. However much she tries to make contact with "the new men," as C. P. Snow calls them, the Queen remains very much a figure from another world.

By sending Prince Charles to Gordonstoun, it is clearly hoped that, when he comes to the throne, he will be in a very much better position to bridge the gap. In theory, at any rate, this hope is reasonable enough. But whether it will work out quite so successfully in practice is another matter.

For, whether we like it or not, the class system is a reality in this country, and likely to remain so for many decades. To be classless is to be alien, rootless, cut off from any truly intimate and satisfactory communion with any section of society. This may change, is changing, but it is still tragically true, as so many "Angry Young Men" eloquently testify.

Thus one argument against Prince Charles' going to Gordonstoun is that he, too, may join these unhappy ranks. For in the past, although national and classless in its public capacity, the royal family has been uncompromisingly upperclass in its private life, rooted firmly in aristocratic soil and able to move happily and naturally within its confines. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that, without the aristocracy to bridge the immense social gap that divides a monarch from his subjects, the life of royalty, in human terms, would become well-high intolerably isolated and artificial.

Yet, by going to Gordonstoun. Prince Charles will be denied this solace. While this may improve the monarchy's institutional image and conform with the egalitarian spirit of the age, I very much doubt whether it will ease the human problems that members of royalty have to face.

Nor is the decision without dangers in the public field. For one reason why, in the past, royal princes have been kept away from school and educated privately is that their constitutional role precludes them from developing the normal ambitions and prejudices which communal school life ordinarily engenders. How, for example, can Prince Charles lead a normal life at Gordonstoun without forming strong political views and without developing an itch to participate actively in one or another of the myriad activities open to ordinary children, none of them open to him?

It is perfectly true, of course, that the Duke of Edinburgh seems to have survived the experience of a normal education without finding the role of royalty too frustrating. But being the consort is profoundly different from being the monarch. While the celebrated independence and outspokenness of the Duke of Edinburgh is lovable and admirable in a consort, it is by no means certain whether it would be equally acceptable in a monarch.

In the final analysis, the success or failure of this innovation in royal education will depend on Prince Charles himself, about whom, quite rightly, the public knows little. He is clearly being groomed to wear the crown at a distinctly more modern angle. Great hopes are being placed on his ability to respond to this challenge.

Children, however, seldom conform to their parents' expectations, and the more they are urged to be one thing the more they feel tempted to be the opposite. It may well be, therefore, that Prince Charles, brought up so purposefully as a commoner, may develop a passion for royal grandeur, just as Edward VIII, brought up so rigorously as a prince, developed a passion for the ordinary life. For even princes have wills of their own.

GROSSMAN-FELDMAN

The marriage of Miss Sharon Feldman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Isadore Feldman, 72 Wenderley Drive, to Samuel Grossman, son of Mr. and Mrs. David Grossman, 69 Wenderley Drive, was solemnized at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, on October 26, at half-past five o'clock, by Rabbi Bernard Rosensweig, and Rabbi G. Felder. The bride, given in marriage by her parents, wore a gown of white peau de soie, adorned with Alencon lace encrusted with seed-pearl-beads, and iridescent sequins over the bodice; on the three-quarter-length sleeves, and down the front of the full skirt, which finished in a cathedral train. A crown of seed-pearl-beads held her fingertip veil of tulle illusion; and she carried a Bible, with white orchids. Mrs. Marvin White, sister of the bride, was matron of honour, wearing a full-length gown of self-patterned gold-coloured silk, fashioned with a low back, and rhinestone brooch, at the back of the pleated waistband. She had a matching headdress; and her flowers were roses, tinted to match her gown. The bridesmaids were: Misses Annette Feldman, cousin of the bride; Maxine Jacobs, and Sandra Jacobs; cousins of the groom; and Estelle Isen. Each wore a gown of pale-blue peau de soie; and matching headdress; and carried a bouquet of roses, tinted pale blue. Diane White, niece of the bride, was flower girl, wearing a pale-blue silk dress; and a garland of matching rosebuds; and she carried a white and gold basket of matching rose petals. Lawrence Grossman, brother of the groom, was best man. The ushers were: Leonard Feldman, brother of the bride; Irving Green, cousin of the bride; Bernard Offstein, and Jerry Goldstein; cousins of the groom. Four hundred guests were present at a dinner and reception at the Synagogue. Mrs. Feldman, mother of the bride, wore a long gown of gold-coloured chiffon, embellished with beadwork; and a matching headdress; and had a mauve orchid wristlet. Mrs. Grossman, mother of the groom, wore a long gown, fashioned with a green satin full skirt, and white beaded bodice; and a matching headdress; and had a white orchid wristlet. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Grossman left for their honeymoon to Jamaica, W.I. The bride departed in a dark-green and white tweed wool suit, with beige beaver cuffs, on three-quarter-length sleeves; and a white net hat; and had a white orchid corsage. They will reside on Mascot Street, in Toronto. Here for the wedding were: Mr. and Mrs. S. Onrot, of Miami, Florida, uncle and aunt of the bride; Mr. and Mrs. M. American Jews Must Oppose All Religious Training Fostered By Government

Address To Yeshiva University, In New York, Graduate School Of Education

BY WILL MASLOW, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

No other religious group in the United States has as great a stake in the separation of church and state as the Jewish community. Jews, recollecting their 2,000 years of dispersion, realize that historically they have never enjoyed full equality in any nation with an established church. This explains the steadfast determination of American Jews to keep government out of religious affairs and to oppose all efforts of government to foster religious training of any kind.

Religious groups, including the Jewish community, are freer and stronger in the United States than they have ever been in any country, and this, too, is the result of adherence to the Constitutional principle of church-state separation. To quote the late Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson: "It is possible to hold a faith with enough confidence to believe that what should be rendered to God does not need to be decided and collected by Caesar."

The Regents' Prayer is bad religiously, bad pedagogically, and bad constitutionally. No true religious feeling can be inculcated by the rote recitation of a diluted and so-called non-sectarian prayer in the public school. Of all religious groups in our country, the Jewish community, whose hallowed traditions include a special language to pray in and even a special form of garb to wear during prayer, should oppose the indiscriminate imposition on all school children of 22 words that are not in the Jewish language of prayer, nor in the Jewish form of prayer, nor even addressed to the Jewish God, but rather to a non-sectarian deity.

In evaluating the consequences of state-sanctioned efforts to inculcate religious feeling, we should look at communities where public officials and school officials are insensitive to the feelings of non-Christian groups: In Miami, Florida, the public schools (until enjoined by a state court) enacted the Crucifixion of Jesus in school assemblies at Easter time. In Chattanooga, religion is a required course in elementary schools. In Levittown, Long Island, New York, a school teacher assigned Jewish children to write an essay, "What I Have Given Up For Lent". In Yonkers, New York, a school teacher berated a Jewish child who refused to sing a Christmas hymn. In Hyde Park, a suburb of Chicago, Illinois, a school paper published a special Easter edition with the headline "Joy to the World, The Lord is Born."

America's great contribution to the art of government and the creation of civil harmony was the separation of church and state. Every branch in that principle invites other breaches. Our interest, however, is not merely to protect our children but to prevent our society from being riven asunder by the demands of competing and other conflicting religious groups.

The First Amendment mandate that church and state shall be separate was based upon the profound commitment that such separation was best for church and best for state. I believe that the history of our nation and the development of the American Jewish community have established the validity of this commitment. More than any other group in the United States, American Jewry looks to the unimpaired and uncompromised preservation of the separation principle for its ultimate security, for it is on this principle that depends the religious freedom which has made our country great, our people strong, and our faith flourish.

NAZI GROUPS INFEST TWENTY-TWO COUNTRIES

While the source of funds poses a problem, the publication pattern of the Nazis is wide open. There is "a flow of anti-Semitic and pro-Nazi and Fascist literature . . . between various countries," Dr. Robinson states. "There exists a "Nationalist Information Bureau" (Natinform) which publishes an anti-Semitic, anti-Israel, pro-Nazi press service. It is reported that the neo-Nazi and neo-Fascist internationals are publishing over 50 periodicals and have bulletins in German, Italian, French, English, Swedish and Arabic.

It all would indicate, not to speak of the costly conferences, that there is no dearth of funds for the anti-Semites and pro-Nazis, who have translated the Communist slogan 'Proletarians of all countries, unite,' into 'anti-Semites of all countries, unite.'"

By Hailing U.S. Supreme Court Ruling Against School Prayers Jews Increase Anti-Semitism

Address To Yeshiva University, In New York, Graduate School Of Education

BY DR. IMMANUEL JAKOBOVITS, RABBI OF THE FIFTH AVENUE SYNAGOGUE IN NEW YORK

The Jewish espousal of the "anti-prayer" position is incompatible both with the traditional teachings of Judaism and with the long-term interests of American Jewry.

It is now increasingly recognized that the widely publicized action of leading Jewish organizations in securing and hailing the Supreme Court ruling against prayers at public schools has added dangerous fuel to the flames of anti-Semitism. By allying themselves with the rampant forces of atheism and secularism, these organizations were bound to expose the Jewish community to the charge of undermining the religious foundations of our Society, whatever the constitutional legalities in support of such a position.

Far more important still is the intrinsic significance of the controversy. To advocate the divorce of religion from education offends against Jewish beliefs and history as well as against the ideals of freedom and civilization we cherish. Judaism, through its Prophets and Rabbis, has always proclaimed that religion is meaningless unless it pervades and ennobles all areas of human life, whether public or private; that humanity cannot survive and prosper unless it acknowledges universally the sovereignty of the Creator; that there can be no brotherhood of man without the Fatherhood of God. Jewish law postulates religious worship as the duty of all men, Jews and Gentiles alike, and it makes it incumbent upon Jews to seek that ideal.

We no longer live in the Middle Ages when the threat to international peace and Jewish security often came from the bigotry of perversely religious zealots. Today the challenge to human and Jewish survival comes from atheistic Communism attacking from outside, and materialistic secularism corroding from within. What we have to fear now is not a Christian country but a godless country.

For Jewish children the exposure to non-Jewish religious exercises at public schools may present an embarrassing, sometimes painful, problem. The only effective solution is, of course, the Jewish parochial school. But worse than a non-Jewish religiously oriented school is a school with no religion at all. No Jewish child has ever embraced Christianity because some prayer was recited at his public school; but countless Jewish children have surrendered their Jewish beliefs and observances because they grew up in pagan schools where religion mattered to neither Jew nor Christian.

Today the scourges of intermarriage, marital faithlessness, juvenile delinquency, dope addiction and other vices are rife precisely because the moral values nurtured and sustained by religious disciplines have been driven from the Central arena of life, and its principal training ground: the schools, to the now peripheral areas of the (often broken) home and the (often empty) church or synagogue.

No one will gainsay the inefficacy of a mere twenty-two word, languid, non-denominational prayer as an instrument of moral regeneration and religious idealism. The attitude to that prayer symbolizes rather than constitutes the bone of contention in the present rift. In this fateful debate, which may well determine not only the moral fibre but the physical survival of the rising generation, the Jewish religious community cannot challenge the primacy of religion in education without betraying the historic mission of the Jewish people as the pioneers of religion, as the originators of compulsory religious education, and as the martyred votaries of freedom of religion, not freedom from religion.

U. S. Chief Justice To Join Day-Long Study Session

United States Chief Justice Earl Warren will participate in an all-day study session at The Jewish Theological Seminary of America, in New York, on Sunday, November 11, Dr. Louis Finkelstein, chancellor of the institution announced. Chairman of the day will be former Federal Judge Simon H. Rifkind, vice-chairman of the Seminary's board of directors. The study program will take the form of a colloquy on the subject, "The Law Beyond The Law," with discussion being related to moral standards in our time. Participants will include members of the Seminary faculty, selected rabbis, and a limited number of scholars and men of affairs. The session will begin at 10 a.m., continue through lunch, and end in the late afternoon.

In the evening, the Chief Justice will be the guest of honor and principal speaker at a dinner at the new Americana Hotel, of New York, held under the auspices of the National Patrons Society of the Seminary. Chief Justice Warren, who recently returned from Israel, where he visited the American Student Center in Jerusalem, and the Schocken Institute for Jewish Research, both of which are adjunct institutions of the Seminary, last visited the Seminary in New York five years ago. At that time he spent a week-end with Dr. Finkelstein and other faculty members in the study of Talmud and Jewish law.

The Faces Of The Dead

The following editorial appeared in the New York Times after Eichmann's capture but prior to his trial in Jerusalem for the murder of six million Jews:

There was a woman who lived in Poland and died there some years ago, and of her life and death only a few things are known. It is known that she was Jewish. This is known because testimony has been given at the trial of Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem that she was murdered near the grave's edge in one of the Germans' massacres of Jews. It is known that she was young. This is known because the child torn from her arms and ripped apart like a rag doll by a guard was a baby and because she had the strength to crawl a few feet toward the pieces of its body.

This much is known, but nothing else. Not what she looked like or what her parents called her the day of her birth or the name her husband gave to her the day of her marriage. But she lives again now and has a face, and this is her pale triumph.

Somebody reads about her in France or in Australia or in New Mexico. She is just one item in the columns of printed horror, but for at least a moment those who read see her face in their minds and hear her cries and remember her anguish. They evoke her and resurrect her.

And this is the story, the mystery and the meaning of the trial of Adolf Eichmann. The nameless and faceless dead have received the blessing of remembrance and are again alive, vivid as a scream in the night, in the minds of men.

Each person who reads the testimony brings the dead back to life and gives them faces. There was a boy in the crowd of Jews being flogged to the grave. He turns around in the mind of some living person and suddenly he has a face and is remembered.

There was a father who wept when he told his son he could no longer give him a father's advice; he has a face. The teacher who rode with his children to death and on the way told them not what he knew was coming but that at last they would see woods and fields and flowers; he has a face, and the beauty and sweetness of his soul is, for others, a matter of tears and remembrance.

But how long will they live in the memory now so newly fresh? How long before they are returned to the final grave of the forever-forgotten, returned by men's desire to turn away from pain and by the very fact that their sufferings were so great and their number so many that sane men cannot — or will not — really retain comprehension of it all?

How long before their resurrection ends? This will be the real verdict of the Eichmann trial and it will not be given by the judges in Jerusalem, but by each person who has read of the suffering and humiliation of the dead and heard their cries and seen their faces.

TO WIN STRUGGLE END PREJUDICE, SAYS U. S. ATTORNEY GENERAL

U. S. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy warned that the United States must end intolerance at home before it can win any struggle with the Soviet Union. In a major address delivered upon receiving the American Jewish Congress Stephen S. Wise Award for Advancing Human Freedom, Mr. Kennedy declared:

"We will not win this struggle just by confronting the enemy. What we do at home, in the final analysis, is just as important. We all must accelerate our efforts to banish religious prejudice, racial discrimination, and any intolerance which denies to any Americans the right guaranteed them by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution."

Speaking only a few hours after Soviet Premier Khrushchev had agreed to dismantle Russian missile bases in Cuba, Mr. Kennedy declared:

"The confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union is in reality a confrontation of all people who believe in human dignity and freedom with those who believe the state is supreme. That is what this crisis is all about; that is why our ships are on station in the Caribbean and why American soldiers are on duty tonight in West Berlin, South Vietnam, and South Korea.

"They are there for the same reason the Maccabees stood their ground against Antiochus, for human dignity and freedom."

Mr. Kennedy praised the "lasting accomplishments" of Stephen S. Wise, a founder and longtime leader of the American Jewish Congress, after whom the award is named, as stemming from "a consuming love of freedom and justice and great courage in fighting for both, characteristic of Jews throughout history." Mr. Kennedy also hailed the work of the American Jewish Congress as a "great contribution in the battle for full equality in a free society for all Americans."

Dr. Joachim Prinz, of Newark, N. J., national president of the AJCongress, presented the award, a bronze medallion, at a dinner in New York, in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. He cited Mr. Kennedy's vigor, courage, and determination that testify eloquently to his deep commitment to freedom.

with the World Council of Synagogues, the international association of Conservative congregations.

Rabbi Friedman called attention to a growing lack of rabbis and religious teachers and said that the Assembly would seek "to recruit promising young men and women and direct them toward a career in the service of the spiritual and cultural needs of American Jewry".
